Colette Saltine

Lux
Typo.

As with most typefaces, life for Colette began in a sketchbook. These thumbnail drawings were only intended to foster ideas and give a sense how the typeface could translate digitally. After sometime had past from releasing the original Colette, the sketches were revisited. With a degree of separation, the thumbnails had their own appeal. They gave a sense of the essence of Colette, but with their unrefinement stepped into their own charm. Further development seemed encouraging and with applying some contemporary features found in Open Type, Saltine was realized.

In 1930, Bob Baker saw his first puppet show in his native Los Angeles and shortly thereafter founded his own “Petit Theatre” in the backyard of his home on New Hampshire Avenue. By age eight, Bob had trained with several different LA-based companies before giving his first professional performance for legendary Hollywood director Mervyn Leroy.

While attending Hollywood High School, Bob began making toy marionettes that sold both in Europe and the United States. After graduation, he began an apprenticeship at George Pal Animation Studios that led to a promotion to head animator of Puppetoons, a landmark studio that produced animated stop-motion puppet films.

After World War II, Bob served as an animation advisor at many film studios. His company’s work spanned decades of creative projects across Los Angeles and the world, from puppetry and design on Disneyland’s Main Street to countless contributions in films and television.

Bob was a tireless advocate for continuation of the puppet arts, providing mentorship and instruction for generations of puppeteers and was instrumental in championing union membership for puppeteers. As a result of his efforts, the

In 1963, Bob and partner Alton Wood transformed a run-down shop near downtown Los Angeles into a family entertainment institution: The Bob Baker Marionette Theater. Since being named an official Los Angeles Historic-Cultural Monument in 2009, the Theater has served over one million children with original shows ranging from “The Nutcracker” to a musical journey through the history of Los Angeles.

When Bob passed away in 2014 at the age of 90, rather than allow the Theater to disappear, the next generation of puppeteers and supporters banded together to keep the show alive and continue the Bob Baker legacy. In 2018, 55 years after the original grand opening, the final curtain fell on the Theater’s historic location. However, imagination continues to dwell at a new location in Highland Park: a 10,000 square foot
